A timely falcadroit often makes the difference between success and failure. Sometimes, even a couple of pips can divert a defender from his best course. West leads his club trey to East's ace, and South routinely plays his deuce. What is the effect of South's unsophisticated play? A perceptive East now knows that South holds four clubs, the same number as West. (West's trey is obviously a fourth-best lead.) Further, South must have at least one club stopper. With K-Q-10 of clubs, West would have led the king. Knowing there is not much future in trying to score enough club winners, East will have good reason to look elsewhere for a possible source of tricks. Accordingly, a wise East may shift to his heart jack at trick two. South's finesse loses to West's king, and the defenders eventually get four heart winners before South can win nine tricks. How to cloud the issue for East? At trick one, South should play his club four instead of his deuce. This small difference may lead East to believe that West has five clubs instead of only four. And if West has five clubs instead of four, why should East look for a dubious heart shift instead of returning partner's suit? If East bites, it's all over. South gets a natural club winner and scores an easy nine tricks.
